

3.5 Fort Augustus to Invermoriston

Map panel 3

Distance 8.9 miles 14.3 km

Terrain forestry road on Great Glen Way; from Allt na Criche to Invermoriston, option of High Route winding path across exposed hillside

Grade the Low Route stays below the 100 m contour, but undulates, in places markedly; the High Route quickly climbs to 200 m, later to a high point of 313 m/1030 ft and is more strenuous

Food and drink Fort Augustus (wide range), Invermoriston

Summary the Low Route runs parallel to Loch Ness's shore with only intermittent views of the water; the more challenging High Route climbs above the trees and offers much better views

- From the main road bridge in Fort Augustus, head north beside the A82 to cross River Oich and pass a garage and the Visitor Information Centre on the left. Within 200 m go up a path leading to a minor road which soon bends right.
- About 40 m before it rejoins the A82, bear left along a discreetly marked path that climbs steeply through tall conifers to meet a forest road: turn right.
- At first trees screen the views, but after the road gains more height, there's a bench with a view over Loch Ness and Loch Ness's only 'island' – actually a crannog, an Iron Age manmade feature. Later it boasted a castle, but now it has only a few trees. It was renamed Cherry Island by Oliver Cromwell.

South over Loch Ness from the Way

- About 250 m after the forest road viewpoint, there's a junction with information board. The Low Route follows the road as it bends right downhill, and is sheltered by forest. The High Route climbs ahead on a path: it has much better views, but is exposed to wind, rain and sun: for directions, see page 52.
- The Low Route soon descends in a zigzag almost to the loch, levelling out at about 50 m to cross the Allt na Criche stream (pronounced alt-na-creeh) at a car park.
- It then follows an undulating, winding route through conifer forest for the next 4 miles or so (6-7 km), never rising above the 100 m contour. About 1 mile (1.6 km) short of Invermoriston, it is rejoined by the High Route.
- There are breaks in the trees which afford views over Loch Ness, and a number of small waterfalls on the left. You may see the house at Port Clair on the lochside; at this point, you are over halfway to Invermoriston.
- After a couple more miles on the forest road, the village of Invermoriston comes into view below. Where the road starts to swing to the left towards Glen Moriston, you are joined from the left by the High Route at a junction.
- Drop down to a path beside the forest road, heading north-west. About 0.6 miles (1 km) beyond the junction, turn sharp right off the forest road down a shortcut path which drops steeply to a minor road.
- Turn right for 400 m, then at the A82 turn left to cross the river and reach Invermoriston.

South over Fort Augustus, Loch Oich distant

High Route

- From the junction reached on page 50, bullet 3, the route climbs steeply through the trees for about 800 m on a constructed path, gaining 140 m of altitude in under 1 km.

- When you emerge from the trees, you are richly rewarded with great views back over Fort Augustus. You can trace the curve of the canal and River Oich, and can clearly see distant Loch Oich perched above Loch Ness – the vertical height difference is 50 m.

- The path swings north-east and continues to climb, first to 290 m and then to its highest point at 313 m (1030 ft), on the shoulder of Carn an Doire Mhoir. Throughout this section it crosses open ground and offers excellent wide views.

'Snake head' rock feature beside the path

- About 1.2 miles (2 km) after emerging from the trees, look across the water to the half-oval of bare scree known as Horseshoe Crag. Legend has it that people were trying to lure Nessie out of the loch by putting a bottle of whisky on the hill. The monster is supposed to have taken the whisky, but returned to the deep, leaving the horseshoe trail behind.

- Soon afterwards you reach a splendid curved stone shelter, built at an ideal spot to enjoy the view over Loch Ness.

North over Loch Ness from the High Route

- There's now a long, winding descent, at first fairly gentle and still with splendid views over Loch Ness. The path crosses Portclair Burn downstream from the lochan that feeds it, and descends further, re-entering the trees about 0.9 miles (1.5 km) after the burn.
- In the forested section, the descent is steep in places, and continues until you reach a junction with a forest road. Cross it and follow a dogleg path down and across another forest road. Here you are rejoined by the Low Route: see page 51 bullet 5.

The winding descent

Invermoriston

This little village is centred on the Glenmoriston Arms, built in the 1800s on a site that dates back to a cattle drovers' inn built in 1740. Parts of the very thick granite walls can still be seen inside. The hotel has had many famous visitors since Samuel Johnson and his biographer James Boswell met here on their historic trip to the Hebrides in the 1770s. The village also has a post office, general store and craft shop. There are toilets inside the Millennium Hall and a drinking water tap outside.

Upper falls of Moriston

East from the Telford bridge, Invermoriston

The village's early growth was based on timber from Glen Moriston. This was used in the 13th century when ships were built from oak and pine to go on the Crusades. By the 1640s, the village sawmill was in action. In the 19th century, trees were floated downstream for use in constructing the Caledonian Canal. Invermoriston depended on water transport until Thomas Telford built local roads.

Telford also designed Invermoriston's splendid old bridge. Begun in 1805, its design was sound, but it suffered from construction problems and spiralling costs. Its financier went bankrupt before completion in 1813. The bridge was restored many times, but after flood damage in 1951, it was replaced by the modern bridge (1954) which gives a good vantage point for admiring the older bridge.

The Way crosses the modern road bridge heading north. To see the old Telford bridge properly, descend steps on the far side of the road bridge, cross the old bridge and drop down to view the upper falls. To explore the lower falls, take the woodland path that descends from the east side of the road bridge. There's a summer house with viewing platform overlooking the river where it tumbles down over hard old rocks towards the loch.

From the road bridge, the Way heads towards the Glenmoriston Arms, perhaps first dropping down the steps to your left to view St Columba's Well. Here in the 6th century, St Columba is supposed to have driven out evil spirits and given the water curative powers.